I don't like the use of the □, but I can't think of a better way to give you the choice of opening a link in the same window or in a new one. It would be great if you could make the choice by left- or right-clicking. Perhaps someone will suggest that to Adobe. However, for now you can make the choice only by clicking in one of two different places.

Clicking on the part of the link other than the □ might also open a new window. You can prevent that by going Adobe Reader's Preferences menu, reached from its main Edit menu, clicking on the Documents category, and selecting the Open cross-document links in same window option in the Open Settings section.

If you opened this text in a new window, you can close that window the same way you close other windows on your computer. If you opened this text in the same window as the link that brought you here, it would be nice if you could return by clicking on the ← button in the left margin. Unfortunately, that button may or may not work when you jump to new text using a link like this□, depending on your operating system, the version of Adobe Reader you are using, and perhaps the weather in Katmandu. It seems always to work if you jump with a link like this. To return to where you came from, click here.
